The Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, commonly known as the Freedmen's Bureau, was created by an act of Congress on March 3, 1865. Under the original act, the Bureau was to be terminated one year after the end of the Civil War, but Congress extended it twice. It went on until 1872. After July 1868, its functions were limited to education and assistance in the collection of claims.

Although the Bureau was part of the War Department, its work was primarily social and economic in nature. It maintained schools for black children, supervised labor contracts between black employees and white employers, assisted black soldiers in collecting back pay and pensions, and handled the disposition of property abandoned or confiscated during the war.
